EIGHT-YEAR-OLD SCHOOL BOY DROWNS IN MARTIN'S CREEK, TULLYTOWN, WITHIN SHORT DISTANCE OF SCHOOL HOUSE

Peter Cummings Goes Through Ice Into Five Feet of Water; Harry Malcolm and Others Go To Rescue and Pull Body Out of the Icey Water—Rescue Squads Work For Several Hours in Effort to Restore Life

TULLYTOWN, Jan. 20.—An eight-year-old school boy drowned in Martin's Creek within a stone's throw of the public school house here this morning. The victim was Peter Cummings, a third grade student, who along with other children was playing on the ice which had formed on the creek during the night.

With Cummings at the time were Robert Freidrich, 8; Robert Baker, 9. Freidrich and Baker said that they were on the shore while Cummings started to walk across the ice and broke through. The water is about five feet deep where the child went in.

Another little fellow, Robert Heble, Fallsington Road, broke through the ice trying to save his chum. Heble just recently recovered from a tonsil operation. He was sent to his home and a physician summoned.

Cummings was pulled from the Creek by Harry Malcolm, Main street, whose attention was attracted to the boy's plight by his wife. Mrs. Malcolm was in her home and happened to glance from the kitchen window when she saw that something was wrong with the children at the Creek. The Malcolms knew "Petie" Cummings as did most of the other residents of this borough. "He was a fine little chap," said many this morning as they milled about the school house awaiting word as to whether or not the icy plunge had been fatal to the lad.

Malcolm was in bed when he heard his wife say "Petie" is in the creek! Malcolm jumped out of bed and just grabbed a few clothes and ran for the creek, broke through the ice and waded around attempting to find the body of the lad. "Suddenly my feet struck on something," said Malcolm. "Then I knew that I had his body."

"I saw 'Petie's' gloves on the top of the ice and in this way knew about where he had fallen in," Malcolm had to wade in the ice-cold water up to his neck in order to get the youngster's body. Malcolm says that he was greatly assisted by his wife and also Mrs. Anderson who started to work immediately on the boy.

Bristol Blood Donors were called and responded quickly and they began giving artificial respiration. Croydon Fire Company, Bucks County Rescue Squad and Goodwill Fire Co., No. 3, of Bristol, also answered the call.

The rescue squads worked over Cummings along the shore of the creek for nearly a half hour and then he was removed to the school house where efforts to restore life continued.

The child's mother and step-father were both at the scene and were overcome with grief. The mother had to be assisted from the school house. Dr. Frank Lehman, Bristol, was called.

ONE ON THE GERMANS

MOSCOW—(INS)—A woman physician used the typhus gag to keep the Germans away from a hospital in the occupied area of Russia. When the Nazis came she showed them one real typhoid victim and they immediately declared a quarantine around the area—a word got about and the hospital became a haven for wounded Red Army men.

NOT SO DUMB

MOSCOW—(INS)—When Russian troops retook certain occupied areas they found that all the women appeared old and slovenly. The women had devised makeup in reverse to simulate wrinkles, age and general ugliness to avoid the attention of the Nazis.

HITLER, PLEASE NOTE

NEW YORK—(INS)—American supplies to Russia are going over German rails—when the British and Russians took over Iran, they found a huge supply of trucks and ties sent by the Germans for future use there.

PORT LYAUTEY, French Morocco—(INS)—It was bound to happen. One of the first things that greets the eye on approaching Port Lyauety, since Americans took over the city, is a large sign reading: "Los Angeles—City Limits."

NEW YORK—(INS)—"Russian Glory," published by the Russian War Relief, relates that a famous Russian cavalry unit, Tuganov's Don Cossacks, were circus riders, going straight from circus arenas to the front.

LATEST NEWS BULLETINS

Germans Again Bomb England

London—In the most audacious and widespread daylight raid since the "hot" days of 1940-41, German Focke-Wulf dive-bombers today bombed and machine-gunned almost a score of points on the south coast of England and swept inland to the London area.

There was considerable non-military damage and some casualties in this reprisal for two devastating Royal Air Force raids on Berlin over the week-end. Berlin now will be able to boast that her planes can penetrate London's vastly improved defenses. But the Nazi fliers have to their credit the indisputable fact that heaviest casualties in dead and wounded occurred in the courtyard of a suburban school.

The Germans struck at the noon hour, catching the youngsters as they emerged from their school rooms for the luncheon recess.

Over the London area, the Nazi formation split into small groups ranging from four to eight machines, which indiscriminately carried out dive-bombing and machine-gunning operations before zooming back into the clouds and hot-footing it back to the coast.

At least one of London's barrage balloons was shot down in flames, and at least one of the Nazi raiders was brought down by the capital's fine anti-aircraft fire.

Report Tojo is Ill

New York—Japanese Premier Hideko Tojo is ill, the Tokyo Radio announced today in a broadcast heard by the Federal Communications Commission. The Tokyo announcement to the empire added that Tojo's illness made necessary a recess of the Diet—legislative body—until January 27.

The recessing of the Diet, the OWI said, may have been the real purpose behind the report since recently Tojo has been assuming more and more dictatorial powers.

THE GREAT GAME OF POLITICS

By FRANK R. KENT
(Distributed by McNaught Syndicate, Inc.)

Such is Politics

Washington, Jan. 19.

ONE of the least edifying aspects of the Flynn case is the demonstration it affords of the way in which so many of our elected representatives are able, at the call of partisanship to rise lightly above their principles. When they have to choose between yielding to political pressure and standing for the national interests, the bulk of them yield. Only a few stand.

IN THE present instance, it is the Democratic majority which is doing the yielding and the Republicans who are doing the standing. But, if the situation were reversed and an equally unsavory appointment sent in by a Republican President, the Republicans, swallowing their self-respect, would support it. The Democrats would then become the champions of decency. Such is politics in these United States; such it always will be until that dim, distant and uncertain day when the great but slightly inert American people develop not only discernment and understanding but a capacity for effective indignation.

IN THE Flynn affair the claim is that approximately forty-seven of the fifty-seven Democrats will vote to confirm Mr. Flynn. In that case he will be confirmed. It would require eleven Democrats voting with all the Republicans to reject him. Full Administration pressure is being exerted to prevent that many defections. No one doubts that in event of a tie our soulful Vice-President, who so eloquently preaches nobility and praises virtue, will cast his unpurchasable ballot to send this discredited politician to a post for which he is totally unfitted.

RETURN OF THE CIGAR

The Cigar Institute of America, which has been fighting the battles of a failing champion for several years, announces that its protégé is back on his feet. Members of the institute are modest. They do not take credit for the revival. They merely note it with pleasure and some surprise.

For a long time the cigar has been overwhelmed by the cigarette. Perhaps the tempo of the times had something to do with the fact that many smokers preferred a quick smoke to a long one.

The cigar speaks of leisure, of time on one's hands. It takes time to prepare a cigar, to admire its contour, to light it and to smoke it. The cigarette by comparison, is a trifle, to be lighted, puffed and thrown aside.

Why, then, when this country is in a greater hurry than ever before, should the cigar show signs of renewed popularity? The institute has the answer. The cigar speaks of wealth as well as of leisure.

The latter may be a thing of the past, but there is more of the former burning holes in pockets than the country has seen in many a long day. No doubt the government can and will remedy this condition. In the meantime, many men who never could afford cigars can afford now to regard them as they used to regard the lowly cigarette.

And the cigar has a fine tradition behind it. Many of the world's outstanding men, good and bad, smoked cigars. The man with a cigar in his teeth was usually a man of influence in his community. The fact that for a time the cigar became the symbol of crookedness in politics merely proves the point.

One other factor operates in favor of the cigar. Like the pipe, it is a man's smoke in a world where women have taken over most of man's prerogatives. Every cigar smoker in effect defies the ladies to take up the habit.

TAKE THE PLEDGE

J. W. Rangell is the premier of Finland. He was questioned the other day about the deterioration in relations between Finland and the United States. To quote him briefly:

"Our relations with the American people have long been so good that they should understand the situation in which we find ourselves through no fault of our own."

"I hope nothing will happen calculated to give the United States cause to declare war on us. Finland already has quite enough enemies in this war."

The Premier Rangell who made this statement is the same Premier Rangell who reportedly refused to have drunk a toast to the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor at a recent party at the Japanese embassy in Helsinki.

Premier Rangell didn't get his decoration for doing things displeasing to the Axis. He really "hopes" nothing will happen to influence an American declaration of war on Finland, he'd better go on the water wagon. Americans do not like his taste in toasts.

Hitler, who complained that last winter was the most severe in Russia in a hundred years, has thus far been unable to find adequate words to describe this one.

THE TRUTH is that of the forty-odd Democrats who are going to vote for Mr. Flynn, with the exception of one or two of the Guffy type, there is not a man who will not do so with a feeling of shame; wishing he did not have to; knowing that Mr. Flynn is a shockingly bad selection. Most of them, in private conversation, do not hesitate to say so. Nor do the silly and synthetic resolutions of the Democratic National Committee improve their state of mind. Some—privately—are exceedingly bitter on the subject. Nevertheless, they are going to vote for him.

WHY? The chief reason, of course, is that they do not want to incur the resentment of the all-powerful President. They know that the Democrats who vote against Mr. Flynn will be marked and remembered by the White House. Hardly one of them but knows that soon or late he will be going there asking for some favor. He does not want to be handicapped by a vote which the President, an acknowledged grudge-bearer, would regard as personally unfriendly. It takes more character than most of these men have to break away from their party organization and party leadership. It isn't an easy thing to do—even on an appointment like this which on merit should not get a single supporting vote—and if pressure and politics were eliminated, probably would not. With the Republicans opposition is largely inspired by politics; with these dissenting Democrats it is a matter of conviction.

HENCE, RELUCTANT and resentful, most of the Democratic Senators will seize hold of Mr. Flynn's defense—when he makes a defense—and, ignoring the facts, make use of it to justify a vote which cannot be justified. Which is all the more reason for honoring the handful of Democratic Senators who, despite Mr. Walker's pleas and White House pressure, will vote against sending such a man to such a nation as Australia. Perhaps there will be enough of them, perhaps not. In any event, they will be entitled to national appreciation for the courage it takes to stand firmly against an unworthy action.

RECENTLY a little piece of political history has been recalled which does not add to the comfort of the Democratic Senators who are preparing to vote for Mr. Flynn and may hearten those who are prepared to vote against him. Back in 1909 a Republican Senator from Illinois, William Lorimer by name, was saved by a narrow vote from election from the Senate on charges of having bribed his way into it. A year later Mr. Lorimer was elected. Within six years of that final vote three-fourths of the Senators who had voted for Mr. Lorimer were re-

"CURIOSITY KILLED A CAT" by ANNE ROWE

CHAPTER EIGHTEEN

Once out of the Inspector's office, our small group broke up speedily.

Dr. Woodill had to hurry to a consultation. Mrs. Libby recalled a dressmaker's appointment for half an hour later—and filled in the time between with a shower of personal questions, all quite apart from the murder and directed at Aunt Millie exclusively. And I used the opportunity to make myself scarce and ran up to my room for a telephone talk with Allan.

I was lucky too. Allan was in the office shack and not, as I feared, somewhere on the extensive strip of coast it was to become a navy yard. And luckier still, Dad was not with him.

The result was a talk that was both long and satisfactory, and full of odds and ends of news and a host of questions, all quite apart from the murder and directed at Aunt Millie exclusively. And I used the opportunity to make myself scarce and ran up to my room for a telephone talk with Allan.

"Your father thinks he wants to work after dinner," Allan informed me. "But I have the sneaking feeling he'd call it off, if you could induce the beautiful Gala to come down—for chess."

The allusion to Gala made me gasp.

I had totally forgotten her over the occurrences of the day and, with her, the puzzling find of the gilt hairpin.

"All right, I'll do that little thing. I'll ask her for dinner, this very minute," I told Allan before hanging up.

Put I didn't have the chance to carry out my intention. Just as I was starting to dial Gala's number—a silly thing to do really, when we lived under the same roof—Nellie knocked and announced another visitor.

"Mrs. Avery calling, Miss Kay," she said with a very face.

Stella Avery had been shown in to the formal reception room beside the front door—a sure sign that Nellie considered the call an intrusion and took for granted I would be short.

Aunt Millie was with her when I came down, sitting stiffly erect under a bombardment of sibilant whippers, carrying much farther than an ordinary voice, but meant to convey the impression of secret audiences and dire warnings.

The moment I entered, these doubtful attentions were transferred to me.

Practically glaring herself upon me, Stella Avery flooded me with assurances of her "sympathy" in my "dreadful ordeal," and hints of valuable disclosures she could make.

"Tell me, tell me, both of you!" she urged, including Aunt Millie in her plea. "What really happened? What did you see in that dreadful house?"

"A dead man," I said calmly. "That was all. There were no lights, you know."

"Oh, yes, yes! But someone told me you heard—a scream. And I thought—" She stopped, her voice suspended in an expectant pitch.

At first I couldn't imagine who had told her. Then I concluded it must have been Conley Forrestall, via his wife or daughter.

"You'll have to excuse me, Mrs. Avery," I said briefly and rudely. "But—no dice. Finding the body doesn't make me a guidebook for murder detection."

She glared at me venomously, and I was preparing myself for an answering snarl, topping mine. But it didn't come.

The venom gave way to sly cunning. "What a fool you are, to shield her!" she said pityingly. "Why will you not learn from my experience? Why do you wait until she's done you a harm?"

"I don't know of whom you are speaking," I assured her curtly.

"Oh, yes, you do!" Her head jerked ceilingward significantly. "Who had a better chance? I bet she has a key to every door of that house and has been using it for her unspeakable purposes all along. Meeting men. Her kind won't even let a cork leg interfere with that."

And poor Professor Stoddard may not have known about the key, but mark my words, if a man like him tried to break into a safe, it wasn't for himself. She made him do it. For her. She was scared young Burton might come back, and wanted to safeguard herself by stealing what she could. Heaven knows why she murdered him, but I'm sure she did. Perhaps he didn't want to do it after all. Perhaps—"

I had had enough. And so had Aunt Millie. We exchanged a look and got up, in unison.

"I wish you wouldn't make my aunt and me the recipients of all your suspicions, Mrs. Avery," I cut into her ugly tirade jeily. "It really puts too much responsibility on us. The proper person to confide in is Inspector Pettengill. Will you come with me to his office, please?"

She got to her feet reluctantly. "Inspector Pettengill's office? But—I have no desire of going downtown, to headquarters—"

"You needn't. The Inspector's office is here, in the house. This way, please."

I firmly grasped her arm and steered her diagonally across the hall, with Aunt Millie, grim-faced but enjoying herself, following close behind, to prevent a possibly contemplated escape.

"But—I don't want to—I have only been telling you what I thought," Stella Avery protested in a sickly voice.

I merely smiled at her in answer, kept a firm grip on her arm and knocked on the drawing-room door.

"Please tell the Inspector, Mrs. Avery is here and wishes to see him," I said quietly when Sergeant Flynn's head popped out in response to my knock.

He nodded, said, "Okay," and closed the door.

A few moments later he opened it again. "The Inspector will see you," he invited, stepping aside to let us enter.

Our arrival apparently ended another interview. Raynolds was standing in the middle of the room, twisting a cap in his gloved hands and glowering at the Inspector, who was walking up and down in front of him.

"You can go now, Roberts. But think about what I said and don't leave the grounds," I heard him say.

And then Roberts passed me, on his way out, with a glance of such accusing hatred that I shivered involuntarily. Now, what had I done to him?

I must have lost track of what was happening, over my surprise at the caretaker's behavior, for I came to with a start when the Inspector said, with a dry chuckle: "That's only a door you're staring at, Miss Kay. What you think it was—that good-looking assistant of your father's?"

Aunt Millie had stated our errand meanwhile, it seemed, and I had only to confirm what she said with a nod. Then the Inspector's attention was all for Stella Avery.

"So you think Miss Burton killed the Professor? Well—I'm thinking don't cost nothing," he beamed at her. "And if you can prove it, I'd say you're good. But—if you can't!"

The smile suddenly was wiped out, the twinkling eyes became steely. "Don't you realize you can't go around accusing people of murder thataway? With no foundation at all, excepting you hate 'em and like to see 'em in jail?"

"The law, Mrs. Avery. You can be sued for libel over doing it—and be convicted too."

"Why, I—Miss Wentworth had no right to drag me here—I was favored with the second lethal glance in ten minutes—"I only said what I thought. No one can be sued for—thinking—"

"Plenty people have been, for thinking out loud," he asserted. "Anyways, it's a good rule to be careful with thoughts. Sometimes they're plain dangerous and boomerang."

"I don't know what Stella Avery would have answered, counting nasty and out-fall, I am sure. But at that instant the door flew open and Alice Forrestall came in, followed by the considerably less precipitate Amy."

As usual, they were the reverse of the appropriate in the room. Amy wearing a coquettish pink dress and a smart, veiled flower to her hair, and Alice in a plain, old-fashioned dress, also as usual, Amy was cool and confident, and Alice was nervous and fidgety.

"My dear Inspector, I'm glad to see you," Alice cooed during her exuberant progress across the room. "Cordley told me, the Inspector had actually moved in on you! How are you, Inspector Pettengill? So glad you are in charge of this awful murder. I'm sure you're going to have it cleared up in no time at all! And you, Miss Wentworth! Coming here on a quiet little visit to your brother, and then dropping into all this horrible excitement! Imagine!"

"Yes—imagine," Aunt Millie said dryly.

And the Inspector smiled—and said nothing.

It didn't discourage her. She turned to me, arms flung out as if to embrace me.

"And you? You poor child! Walking right in on murder! I'm certain you never had such a thrill in all your wanderings through those outlandish places you've been! Let me look at you! Why—you look well! I was afraid you'd be pale and ill—gone to pieces, you know. Really, this terrible thing hasn't affected you half as much as it has Amy. She almost fainted with horror when her father told us the news."

"Mother!" said Amy, languidly and with an exasperated sigh.

It didn't stop the waterfall of Alice Forrestall's chatter, but it did give her pause enough to discover Stella Avery's presence.

Her face fell. "Oh—Stella! She has beaten us to it! She complained childishly. And then turned right back to me.

"My dear Kay—I may call you Kay, mayn't I?—I hate to bother you—I mean—I make you repeat what you've told Stella, if you've already told her. But—we are so curious! My husband only mentioned the bare facts. Men are so unsatisfactory! They always leave out the most interesting details."

She stepped close to me, half drawing me into her arms. "Please tell us! Unless it distresses you too much, of course. I wouldn't want to distress you, for anything in the world."

I used the semi-embrace for a questioning glance at the Inspector, soundlessly forming with my lips: "What shall I do?"

"His twinkle broadened. 'Tell her,' he signaled back in the same manner."

It was a relief.

I gently disengaged myself and indicated a chair. "Oh no, it doesn't distress me in the least. I'm getting used to—telling all," I assured her sweetly, in a conscious imitation of her manner. "Please sit down. You too, Amy—I may call you Amy, mayn't I?"

Amy only threw me a glance—the third one this afternoon that would have killed me, if glances had the power to do so—and sat down, a little apart from the rest of us.

MAURICE DELKER IS NAMED PRESIDENT, SPORTSMEN'S ASS'N

Gift Presented Secretary John Johnson for Outstanding Service

SHOW GAME PICTURES

Wm. Hoffmeister, Winner of '42 Game Fish Contest, Given Prize

Maurice Delker, well-known local sportsman, was named president of the Bristol Fish & Game Protective Association for 1943 when members met at the Odd Fellows Hall here last evening. He succeeds N. Rubino who held the office last year.

The office of vice-president was filled by Howard Asay. The new treasurer is John C. Johnson, and the post of secretary will be filled by Joseph Elbersen.

In recognition of his outstanding services as the association's secretary for the last nine years retiring secretary John Johnson was presented with a fly rod and fly reel by members.

The winner of the 1942 game fish contest conducted by the association for its members, William L. Hoffmeister, Newtown, was presented with the prize for the largest game fish catch of the past season. The presentation was made by John R. Burd, chairman of the fish committee, and consisted of a fresh water bait casting reel. Hoffmeister's winning entry was a 4 pound 2 ounce smallmouth bass taken from the Neshaminy Creek.

A program for the trapping of rabbits on certain posted areas in this section and their release on open hunting territory was discussed by members. The State will furnish the traps for the program when present plans are completed.

A plea was made by retiring president Rubino that a membership drive be conducted by the association. "If each one of the men present tonight would make it a point to bring in 25 new members for the present year we would have a strong and outstanding organization," he declared.

Following the business section five reels of motion pictures were presented. The pictures, which were shown by C. W. Winter, were furnished by the Pennsylvania Game Commission. Three of the pictures, in technicolor, and entitled "How To Become A Shooter," outlined the succeeding steps in the successful handling of a shotgun.

The other two reels, one on Pennsylvania bird life and one on Pennsylvania animal life, were declared by members to be two of the best pictures on these subjects ever presented. Both showed intimate and interesting views of birds and animals in their natural habitats and included scenes on feeding, mating, etc.

BRISTOL HIGH SCHOOL FIVE HANDS GEORGE SCHOOL A STINGING DEFEAT, BEATING VISITORS BY SCORE OF 34 TO 27

The Bristol High basketball team rebounded from two straight losses to hand a stinging defeat to the George School five last night on the local court. Final tabulations were: Bristol, 34; George School, 27.

There was nothing shady about the Bunnies' victory as they took the lead in the opening period and maintained it throughout the thirty-two minutes of playing. Until the final moments of the contest, the Bristol lead was never more than five points and most of the time only two points, separated the teams.

Bristol had to be at its best to beat the visitors who had a big advantage in height. Even Paul Ruby, husky Bristol center, appeared small compared to Nelson and Baker who opposed him and several of the other George School players also towered over the Bunnies!

And there was no doubt as to the shooting and passing ability of the George School boys and only the alert defensiveness of the Cardinal and Gray prevented the visitors from grabbing the lead on several occasions. In fact, twice in the last two minutes of the game, George School players missed goals when the ball bounced out of the net after going part-way in.
